Lincoln 1st Inn 11th May 1795

It is impossible for me, my dear Obed, to ascertain how many of my letters have been sunk, burnt, or taken since the commencement of the war, but the number must have been prodigious, since, in spite of my punctuality as a writer, I seem to have lost all character as a correspondent. I have no doubt but it will be restored to me at the peace, which our Stock jobbers say can be at no great distance, but to which I do not imagine we shall make any advances till we have tried the fortune of another Campaign. The french are I believe well enough disposed to treat, but not I fear on any terms to which we could listen. Sir Fred^l. Eden is just returned from France - He had been sent to attempt to settle a cartel - They told him they did not want men so much as we did & therefore would not agree to an exchange, but that it was in our power to have all our ~~men~~ men at once by agreeing to a peace. The Emperor seems resolved to make one more Campaign whether any other power will do the same seems doubtful - Prussia has concluded, & Spain is said to be negotiating, a Treaty. France is in the extremest state of want. The government begins to depart from the moderation it had affected since Robespierre's downfall. Indeed it seems to be getting into different hands. The old remains of the Brissotian party are gaining an ascendancy. They are more of Republicans upon principle than the Modérés who were immediately instrumental in bringing about the last revolution. The latter are accused of a leaning to Monarchy, & some severe laws have lately been passed against Emigrants who had begun to return in considerable numbers, & had not at first been molested by the government. - Of Irish affairs I hope Cruise will give you a full detail. The Catholic Bill which Lord Fitzwilliam so rashly engaged to support has been rejected on the second reading by a great Majority. I take it for granted it would have passed by as great a one, if he had continued.

They are a practicable people, the members of the Irish House. - We have had a number of riots in different parts of the country about the price of provisions. The most serious circumstance attending them is that the Militia has in almost every instance joined the mob, instead of acting against them. This seems to prove the truth of Arthur Young's proposition that property can have no absolute security unless proprietors have arms in their own hands. By every ^{other} force it is liable to be invaded instead of being protected. On this idea corps of Gentlemen & Yeomanry have been formed throughout the country. If there were public spirit enough to carry this scheme to its utmost extent, it would afford us the best security against a levelling revolution - for that a mere army is not to be depended on for that purpose, the example of France sufficiently demonstrates. - I am glad you so soon stopped the growing spirit of sedition in your province. Your spirit & temper have the praise they merit. I hope you received my letter on Treason. I shall perhaps be able to write you another sheet before the convoys sails. Mean time I remain faithfully yours

M. Pitt
